

The Royal College of Pathologists
Pathology: the science behind the cure

Red Blood Cells

Red blood cells are the main constituent of the blood and are responsible for its red colour. They contain haemoglobin, an iron-containing compound that transports oxygen around the body. If you don't have enough red blood cells you may develop anaemia.

Haematologists specialise in the treatment of blood disorders.